Where we work, how much money we make, what we do in our free time, and who we choose to spend our time with are all direct responses to the drive to be happy. The issue with this is, none of these things can make us happy. You can have all the money in the world, the most attractive partner you could imagine, work at your dream job, and buy anything you want at any time, and you still may struggle with the elusive idea of happiness.

We are born into a world that tells us things are the key to happiness. If you have enough money, enough friends, and enough stuff, happiness is a guarantee. But if that were the case, than wouldnt you be happy whenever you bought something new? Sure, you might be happy with it for a while, but you certainly arent happy with it in a life changing kind of way.
