Not illustrated. 1841 Excerpt: ...by all men all ovir de varld, replied the skipper, with another most obsequious reverence. By St. Andrew, but this is a curious marvel though, said the captain. Who would have thought that my name could have been known in France as a hero! Yet certain it is that I have done some small deeds in my time, that these French mooshies may have heard of. Deeds, Monsieur le Capitaine! cried De Tremouille, with feigned astonishment; Vondaires in bataille! meeracailes in de feelde! van Achilleof Scotlande! But all datis nossing at all compare to de fame of Monsieur le Capitaine for his vonderful taste for de good vine! Ven dey do talk of good vine in France, dey do alvaise say--Aha! dis is vine fit for de pallait of van Empereur; bot dis ere is more bettaire, dis is fit for de pallait of de famous Scottish hero, de Capitaine Strang, dat do know good to ave mor of him pour de largent, and prevail on do Royal King, his broder, to ave some too also. Um--aye, said the captain of the guard, with hesitation; likely story enough--though there be but little chance of the King drinking ought of the Dukes providing, whatever liquor the Duke may by and bye drink of his Majestys brewing. But twas natural enow in the meres chant to think so, Mooshie. As for the Duke, he is no bad customer to his own fist, when he is well set with a jolly boon companion, such as myself for instance. So thou mayest as well leave thy twin-casks in my charge, friend; and I shall see that they are properly delivered.--At least, added he, in an under voice, aside, I shall take care most conscientiously to deliver them in due time of their contents. Tank you--very mosh tank you, sare, replied the ...
