

The Increasing Dead

Henri could not ignore it . . . It was simple: the school was haunted. He had thought little of it at first. He needed the job and he had always dreamed of teaching, but soon enough it seemed that the little disturbances felt well more worrying than they ought to be. The little things were the most disturbing: the way that the stereo would turn itself on, the way that the doll in his office would move at night, and even the way the clock would fall from the wall. It scared him. It wouldnt have been so bad, but considering the death of the teacher that came before him . . . he wondered if his predecessor was out for revenge. That wasnt to mention his psychic pupil, the girl with the strange accidents, or his somewhat supernatural uncle. All in all, it was a little much to bear. He had to get to the bottom of it and soon. There would only be more deaths.
