

The Fallacy of Tree Rings

Most people have looked at tree rings. We all know how there's supposed to be one ring each year. Yeah, that's usually true, but sometimes the rings are so small that they can't be differentiated. Then there's the difference in the ring sizes. Larger rings are to show when the growing conditions for the tree are better. Some years ago, some decided to compare tree rings. They came up with the idea that rings from one tree could be compared to those of another tree. Then they took it a step further, saying that each tree's rings could be matched up with the rings of another tree. Yeah, that was a nice theory but they went too far for me. They decided that they could match long-dead trees with alive or trees not dead so long and establish dates for the various rings. Then they went a step that was too far for me. They told how they had a set of rings on some very old tree (over 7,000 years old) and matched to rings from some very very old tree and figured out how to extend the information on the rings and thus have data for 12,000 years. I saw their supposed years of where the rings matched. I saw almost no correlation. I decided that I wanted to try this. The science of this is, dendrochronology. I was lucky in that there were six elm trees in a local park that succumbed to Dutch Elm disease so I photographed the rings, counted them, and compared them. I also frequented the South Lake Tahoe area so I did the same for trees there. This book is that study.
