Excerpt: ... Missionaries Remonstrate 43 They were sometimes betrayed by the unknown presence in hiding at the mission stations of belligerents which brought upon them destruction and spoliation. But they often suffered upon mere supposition and were embittered in consequence. Yet withal, they set a firm example of loyalty and respect for any government having the right to command it and faithfully counselled for good those to whom they were dedicated. It was natural that their summary expulsion should draw indignant remonstrance. The first to appeal to the High Commissioner was the Rev. Hamilton Dyke, a Scotch divine allied to the Paris Society. Writing as a British-born subject from Aliwal North, where he was banished in February 1866, he warmly resented the dishonour thrust upon him after twenty-six years labour in Basutoland, and the injustice inflicted upon him through injury to character and property. Messrs. Rolland, Mabile, Coillard and Maitin poured forth in piercing tones their grief and sufferings under eviction. The Consul for France in Cape Town, the Ambassador in London, the Secretary of State and various philanthropical societies in England were all moved to champion their cause. All agreed that it was an outrage to condemn a body of highminded men without even the opportunity to exculpate themselves; but none could remove the decree. Some months later under pressure of public opinion the Free State, upon the recommendation of a Commission, agreed to let the missionaries return under the condition that they should pay for each station (their own buildings) the sum of ?100, and then be Vol. 11 5 entitled to an area of 1,500 morgen of ground adjoining, provided that such buildings and land should be regarded as their personal property, to be sold if...
