

The Typhus Epidemic in Eastern Macedonia (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Typhus Epidemic in Eastern Macedonia Burdened with all the misery that human flesh is heir to, the Greek refugees from Bulgaria began to pour into Oriental Macedonia shortly after the declaration of the armistice, and the stream continued through the fall and winter of 1918 and through January 1919, since which time they have continued to come, but in gradually diminishing numbers. They came by thousands, cold, hungry, thirsty, filthy and vermin-infested from a country lousy with typhus fever; they suffered such frightful privations that many died by the wayside. Human wretchedness in all its protean varieties affecting large groups of people blazes the way for the spread of disease. No wonder, therefore, that typhus fever appeared in sporadic form in Kavalla, Drama, Serres, Demir Hissar and a few other smaller centers through January, 1918, and continued to smoulder in these centers through January, 1919; the wonder is that the disease did not assume epidemic form much earlier than it did.
