Excerpt from Universal Metering of Chicagos Water Supply: The Need for It, What It Would Accomplish

The need for adopting and carrying into effect a policy of universal metering is recognized by practically every one who has given thought to the question. The following are the main points urged in support of such a policy:

The Chicago Water Works is pumping an average of 260 gallons of water daily for every man, woman, and child in the city. This is about twice as much water per person as most other American cities find ample to supply their requirements. Cleveland and Milwaukee, lake cities where conditions of supply and distribution are similar to those in Chicago, and where universal metering prevails, have a daily pumpage of less than 125 gallons per person. And their service is much better than ours. Not more than half the water pumped in Chicago is ever really used. The other half is lost through waste and leakage. This loss is due to leaks in the pumps, in the mains and service pipes, and in house plumbing. It is due also in some cases to either careless or wilful waste on the part of consumers. Meters are proposed as a means of locating and checking so far as practicable this loss of water which is of no use to any one. They are not intended to discourage the use of water in abundance, and experience in other cities shows that they do not in fact discourage such use. Any one can go to Lake Michigan and take as much water as he likes. The business and the problem of the Chicago Water Works is to transport water from the lake to the premises of consumers and to deliver it under sufficient pressure to enable users, including those living upon upper floors, to get it whenever they need it.
