

A Worthwhile Undertaking

This is a factual account of the funeral arrangements I made for a close friend of mine, Martin Drury, who died in September 1990 at the Mildmay Hospice in London. He had requested the cheapest possible funeral so that he could leave his funds to the Mildmay. Not finding the cheapest undertakers offer fitted the bill, I set about organising my own funeral for Martin. Twenty years later, I still think DIY funerals are the best option for performing the final act of friendship, and for grieving. I include the piece on Kindle in the hope that it will inspire others to keep their loved ones out of the hands of strangers. It should be easier now than it was then. Martin was from Oregon, USA. We met while working in Iran in the late 1970s. Separated during the revolution in 1979, we met up again in Saudi Arabia in the mid-eighties. Martin contracted HIV and, after many wanderings, came to stay with me at my small flat in London. He was then transferred to the Mildmay Hospice, where he passed on. At no time during his time in England did anyone query his right to treatment on the National Health Service, for which I shall always be extremely grateful. I hope this gratitude comes out in the piece. The enterprise would have been impossible without my friends, and the good people I met along the way.
